The physical and biological properties of a new extracellular matrix gel derived from a bovine corneal endothelial cell line. During corneal endothelial cell (CEC) transplantation, it is necessary to provide an extracellular environment that allows the cells to attach and spread while resisting the mechanical forces of intraocular surgery. To accomplish this, a CEC culture was supplemented with a protein fraction (beta-tricalcium phosphate gelatin, PGA) derived from mouse submaxillary gland. Using a method that mimics cell migration, preconfluent cultures of CEC were allowed to spread in the presence of added PGA. Once the cells reached confluence, they were removed and seeded at high densities into a new collagen gel. This gel is capable of supporting the proliferation and migration of cells. It is formed by a coprecipitation of collagen type I and PGA and permits transfer of cells from a collagen substrate into a defined, three-dimensional matrix. When placed in cultures, the cells gradually attached and proliferated, after which they underwent transition to a more differentiated phenotype, characterized by a flattened cellular morphology, presence of desmosomes and development of cell-cell contacts. Electron microscopic studies showed that the cells that formed the original confluent cell layer had been partially extracted from the underlying matrix and were found to be entirely embedded in the new gel. The PGA macromolecule is not digested by cellular proteases and is therefore carried by the cell after entry into the matrix. Our results demonstrate that PGA-collagen gels are an appropriate three-dimensional ECM and support the attachment, growth, and migration of CEC.

Serena Williams stepped out for her first public appearance since she learned she's pregnant with her first child with husband Alexis Ohanian at an event for British Vogue. The tennis star wore a custom Versace dress with a turtleneck during the event in London on Monday and captivated the crowd with her witty and touching speech. "I'm not going to say too much because I don't want to mess up the baby," Williams said jokingly. "But I'm very excited to be a first time mom to a little baby girl." The 23-year-old tennis star, who stunned the world in June when she announced she'd be welcoming baby number one, told the crowd: "I'm really honored to be here. I'm so happy to have been named a Vogue cover girl." Earlier this month, Williams admitted she was struggling to keep her pregnancy a secret. "Truthfully I have gotten very sick and very tired," she wrote in a tweet. "But I will push through and be as much of a mom as I can be." She went on to say: "I feel awful that I've had to keep such a big secret from my husband and the rest of the world." Williams is already the mom of 7-year-old daughter Olympia, with ex-husband Richard Williams.

The invention relates to a heat exchanger. Heat exchangers are used in various technical and commercial applications in which a heat-transfer fluid is used to heat or cool the other fluid which is to be treated. As a rule, such heat exchangers have a header of metal which carries heat-transfer tubes. A flow of the heat-transfer fluid is carried out across the tubes and exits the other end via holes in the side of the header. In the header a tube plate is inserted which is necessary in order to prevent bypass of the fluid. The header may have a valve plate, as a rule in the form of a butterfly valve. Between the header and the tube plate is arranged a sealing ring which may be a lip seal, an O-ring or an diaphragm. However, as a rule the sealing ring is mounted in a position which is not ideal. The purpose of this study is to develop a method to detect the presence of a fragile, protein-containing
