While cynicism towards politicians has been consistently proven to be more prevalent in certain countries across the globe, the relatively high prevalence of cynicism in the Indian context has not been studied in detail. This study examines whether cynicism among Indians is differentially higher towards one particular type of politician — national leaders — and/or more prevalent in urban settings. A sample of 1,500 participants from Mumbai, Delhi, and Bangalore participated in in-person interviews and completed questionnaires. The findings show that cynicism towards national politicians is significantly higher than towards regional politicians across all three countries. Cynicism towards national politicians is significantly higher in urban India (Delhi and Mumbai) compared to non-urban India (Bangalore). The authors do not discuss the role of individual voter characteristics, but they do say that “the two cities are similarly economically developed and characterized by higher levels of experienced social capital (D’Amico 2007). The authors conclude that “[c]ynic attitudes toward the national politicians are an important social-psychological factor that could shape public opinion and electoral preferences.” In my opinion, the findings are limited in several ways. First, although the authors provide demographic details that show a higher level of education and experience in Delhi and Mumbai compared to Bangalore, the authors only provided a global comparison of cynicism levels in the three cities using a 2x2 ANOVA. The lack of this difference analysis in the context of urban-rural difference (Delhi is urban, and Mumbai and Bangalore are rural) limits the generalizability of the findings. Moreover, the authors only used a single question to elicit levels of cynicism. A single question is valuable, but does not address the complexity of individual cynicism. It is also worth noting that the authors only indicate ‘national’ politicians, and do not specify the question to specifically ask about national leaders — for example, the government, prime minister, president, etc. Finally, the level of cynicism in Mumbai and Delhi are not significantly different in comparison to the level of cynicism in Bangalore. Given the difference in urban
