FILE PHOTO: The logo of Hyundai Motor is seen at the 32nd Moscow International Automobile Trade Fair (MIAT) in Moscow, Russia, April 11, 2017. REUTERS/Sergei Karpukhin Hyundai's Asia head Scott Roeder told reporters on the sidelines of the Korean Auto Forum in South Korea's capital on Wednesday that sanctions risk hurting the global economy, including South Korea's export-led economy. Washington has escalated the North Korean threat by imposing fresh sanctions, with the United Nations Security Council agreeing to impose the strongest level of sanctions ever on North Korea. [NLSNIMS1V] North Korea has not conducted a missile or nuclear test since November, and some analysts say a new, more powerful missile was tested by Pyongyang last week. But the North continues to produce and test new ballistic missiles. "If Western sanctions do not affect Hyundai Motor as part of the broad global economy, we will not be negatively affected," Roeder told reporters. "There is some disruption of short-term demand, but we will be working on that for a short period of time." U.S. Defense Secretary Jim Mattis has said the U.S. military will respond with "appropriate measures" if there are any signs of renewed missile activity by North Korea. Roeder reiterated South Korea's stance that South Korea-U.S. military drills are not driving
