Photoshop CS2 is the latest version, having replaced the previous, long-time title of Photoshop 5 (which was replaced by Photoshop 5.5). It also supports 16-bit, float-based data, having added support for floating-point precision floating-point data. This type of precision data is typically used to handle media such as web graphics that need to be precise in size but not necessarily pixel-accurate, as pixels are physically discrete. Now, it is possible to manipulate images with such precision, while still retaining the high-quality aesthetics that Photoshop is known for. However, as floating-point data is an extension to standard 32-bit color formats, it comes at the cost of occupying 4 bytes for each pixel (4 bytes = 2 bytes = 32 bits). It is in this area that Photoshop's floating-point precision can help, as the number of significant bits (i.e., the number of significant digits) are controlled by the floating-point exponent. The Exponent To use 32-bit floating-point precision in Photoshop, you need to select "Float" for both the color format (RGB or CMYK) and the data type. With floating-point precision, the color format is based on 8 bits of color data, with the remaining 24 bits being a number that defines the precision. If Photoshop is for editing scans or flat-bed (photographic) images, then using 8 bits of color data can often yield good results (as the precision allows for a larger degree of color density) while using 32 bits of data can yield a much higher degree of precision. The number of significant bits in the 32-bit floating-point data is controlled by the floating-point exponent. The exponent defines the number of significant bits, as seen in the following equation: $(\text{Exponent} - 1) / 16$; the mantissa is the fraction with the floating-point number. If the exponent is 24, then the floating-point value has 24 significant bits, as in $(24 - 1) / 16 = 0.05555555555555555$. To illustrate how Photoshop uses the floating-point exponent, let's examine an RGB (rgb) 32-bit floating-point color. We'll call this color red, as these colors are typically used to represent red (255, 0, 0) and the red gradient in the "Shimmer" tutorial is the one example of a linear gradient that

Q: Inserting from multiple tables into one I'm trying to create a function in MS SQL 2008 that will insert into two of my tables by running an INSERT INTO statement for each table. I thought it would be something like this: INSERT INTO [BatchTable] SELECT [BatchID], [Batch] FROM [BatchTable] UNION SELECT [BatchID], [Batch] FROM [BatchTable] However, this returns the following error: Msg 210, Level 15, State 1, Procedure spInsertBFupd, Line 0 An expression of non-boolean type specified in a context where a condition is expected, near 'UNION'. Any ideas on what I'm doing wrong? A: This is the syntax you are looking for: INSERT INTO [BatchTable] SELECT [BatchID], [Batch] FROM [BatchTable] Products Shipping & Returns Our products are shipped on the days listed on the order, unless otherwise noted.
