Thursday, September 16, 2014 Ahead of the Curve: The Bay Area's Own Michael Sade on the American Dream By Michelle Lim On a hot July day in 2003, I walked into the tiny Great Barrington, MA Bookstore and purchased the biography of Michael Sade for $10. I took it to the counter, smiled and paid for it. Tipped the young man 10 bucks and left. At the time, the book was my life. By the time I got home and opened it, I was hooked. The Last Days of the American Dream by Michael Sade has a story as haunting as any of James Ellroy's novels I've read. It's also filled with a sense of longing that matches my own. The story begins with the protagonist's birth, in 1950, in a dingy apartment building in Watts, a working class neighborhood in Los Angeles. It ends with the victimization of his teenage son, Michael in his early 30s, who's tortured and murdered in Central Park in Central California. The text is beautifully written and Sade has an acute ear for dialogue. He also captures a whole range of characters and their relationships so well that you can almost hear them speaking the story. The book is moving, provocative and one of the best I've read. The Story of Michael Sade Michael Sade was born of Latina mothers. His real father was a well-known black actor, Cecil Andrew Sade. His mother was white. He was raised by his grandmother and was one of nine children, all of whom he loves and admires. There is a sense of loss in Michael and his history. He misses those days when his mothers and grandmother lived in the same building. Sade was a straight A student
