Beef is back in fashion — and the grass-fed variety is not just for vegans anymore. During the past decade, the meat market has undergone a big shift as new shoppers in growing numbers have decided that high-fat, nutritious grass-fed beef is a good thing. Demand for the variety of the meat, which is naturally high in omega-3 fatty acids, has been growing and it is now also available at supermarkets in Vancouver. Food columnist Kim Donaldson says farmers are starting to cash in on the rise of grass-fed beef — at times by selling it for higher prices. She says now, farms are looking to sell some of their beef for high prices, because they are going to sell it at the high-end markets. "And it seems to me, it's the specialty stores and restaurants who are the ones taking advantage of that, because it does fit in with the status and the style of their menus. They are not looking to make one specialty market rich." The growth of grass-fed beef, Donaldson says, is having an impact on meat prices. "I think we're seeing a bit more of a rise in beef prices. And with the rise in beef prices, people are eating less pork, so they're looking to more grass-fed beef. I think that explains part of the price increase in beef." Beef production has been bumping along at more than six million heads this year, she says, "but it's actually not that many more than we normally get in this part of the world." Donaldson says most dairy and lamb farmers have been going with a "more sustainable" practice in which they raise sheep in pastures, free from hormones, antibiotics and artificial hormones. She says there are a couple of reasons for the new market. The first is that Americans have become more concerned with the amount of fat and cholesterol in their diets. "So Americans and people in North America and Europe especially, [have] come to the decision that they would rather eat grass-fed beef than the high-calories conventionally-fed stuff." Donaldson says it is also because of the bigger focus now being put on the environment. "It's an important part of the beef industry to grow better grass and not have fertilizer run off into the rivers, to be more sustainable for the environment." Many consumers are also now looking to grass-fed beef
