In particular, the invention relates to detecting if the quality of a received signal is acceptable, in which signal quality is determined by comparing a received signal with a training sequence. 2. Discussion of the Related Art A digital signal is often received via a transmission medium that degrades the fidelity of the signal. Even where a user has selected a relatively good transmission medium, a signal may be sent through a channel with characteristics such that the signal fidelity is degraded at the destination. In satellite communications, the reception of a signal over a satellite relay link, for example, may be hampered by fading, atmospheric disturbances and the like. Various approaches have been proposed for dynamically measuring the signal quality of a received signal. Generally, a signal is applied to a correlation receiver and the output of the correlation receiver is measured. In one approach, as exemplified in U.S. Pat. No. 5,278,831 issued to Penn, a received signal is applied to a correlation receiver. The resulting signal may then be passed to a quality-of-service (QoS) monitor. The QoS monitor acts to demodulate the received signal and measure the signal's correlation amplitude. The QoS monitor then reports the results to a processor. The processor may then make decisions about the quality of the received signal. Unfortunately, the correlation receiver approach is limited to detecting (or estimating) amplitude-modulated signals and to signal quality based on signal amplitude. Another approach, using training sequences, is disclosed by K. Nagata et al. in "Adaptive Noise Cancellation for Digital Synchronous CDMA System," IEEE J. Select. Areas Commun., Vol. 10, No. 5, June 1992. This approach uses a training sequence to make amplitude-based decisions about the quality of a signal
