The user on the Mac has to get to his Settings > General > Accessibility. In the Accessibility window he can then select Magnifier from the panel on the left. The Mac browser (Safari) is also available in a magnified mode, but it might not be as convenient for users as this feature. In this case you can download the Safari Browser Magnifier (free) (You can also use the magnifier in System Preferences > Universal Access > Display). The magnifier lets you zoom into images and text. Some users might not see a noticeable difference, especially if the image or text is large in relative terms. Hendrick Feltman did a photo shoot to celebrate his new book of job applications – and the results are hilarious Hendrick Feltman Job applications aren't always easy – but when you do have a second chance to impress your potential employer, what better way to do it than with a photo shoot? That was the thinking of Dutch artist Hendrick Feltman when he created this spectacularly funny job application photo shoot. The blank white space is punctuated by several giant job application letters – an act of their own to potential employers, which would see them invited to complete and submit their own applications. Mr Feltman took the opportunity to do a series of silly and fun job applications by sending them to famous New York buildings that are sadly no longer in existence. The results were so funny that they have been shared widely across the internet, reaching nearly 20,000 people. Despite the humour, they also have a serious point, with the artist reminding us that we each have the power to shape our lives. Mr Feltman has commented: 'Some buildings are no longer there but one of the world's iconic buildings, the Empire State Building, is still very much alive. The old space could be potentially closed for the worse, but it can be a great opportunity to write a new story, a new meaning to life. And it will make a lot of people happy.' 'The Empire State Building' was published in September, and can be purchased here/*****/
