Q: Function Pointer-to-member return type vs non-member return type I'm trying to understand the difference between the following two C++ signatures and their use. First one ReturnType func(ArgType) and Second one ReturnType func(ArgType) In my understanding, the first signature is used to return a function pointer (which I then pass to a method). The second signature is used to return a function pointer directly, which can then be passed to a method. Am I right so far? Am I also correct in saying that the first signature only functions if the class has a certain additional member (e.g. a 'this' pointer in the constructor)? Why wouldn't the second signature be a member-wise signature instead? A: I think you can use the second signature with a class. The first signature will not. void (*func)(ArgType) = funcObject.func; What is going on with void (func)(ArgType) = (void ()(ArgType))&funcObject.func; is that it would return the same function pointer, but without any use of it.
