Thanks to 'In the Details' for sending this in, as it was posted on another site with a clue (End In The Details' edited comment) but not the screenshot. In the end we had to go through a lot of muck and traps - but it was all worth it! ;-) Edit: Ok that In the Details post was totally misleading - it is a fake and not from us! Apologies. A: (Mostly copied from comments) The present invention relates generally to aircraft braking systems and, more particularly, to a system for hydraulically modulating pressure actuated braking devices associated with an aircraft in which the pressure actuated braking devices (PADs) have an air/oil flow path from a brake actuator, thus eliminating the need for a fluid return line to the brake actuator. Aircraft braking systems utilize a number of different pressure actuated braking devices, such as disc brakes, vented disc brakes, and drum brakes. Actuation of pressure actuated braking devices is controlled by pressurized air supplied by a central aircraft computer. In conventional applications, the pressure actuated braking devices are controlled by a computer which simultaneously actuates a number of the pressure actuated braking devices. The computer then receives brake command signals from a set of position/force sensors which indicate the position and force of the brakes. In response to the received brake command signals, the computer sends a command signal to the hydraulic actuators which actuate the brakes, and the actuators supply a pressure to the braking devices. In this manner, the braking devices are applied against a rotating surface of the aircraft. Ideally, the braking systems are adjusted for optimal performance. The pressure generated by the brake actuators is controlled based on the position and force (i.e., force applied against the brakes) of the brakes. In conventional systems, the force applied to the brake is proportional to a pressure that is supplied by the brake actuators. In a typical arrangement, the brake actuators provide the brake pressure to the disc brakes and the vented disc brakes are vented to the atmosphere. The proportionality of the force applied to the brake to the pressure supplied by the brake actuators assures that the applied force is suitable for the given application. In some aircraft applications, the braking system includes drum brakes which are actuated by a pressure. In particular, the drum brakes act as the braking device. The brake is moved against the ground by the application of pressure to the
