If you had any doubt about Boston Dynamics' capabilities, start with the RoboDoc, and the rest of the Atlas line, then follow the name "Douglas" to the Boston Dynamics web site and see the video. This is a curious video by the way. More footage of robots doing unconstrained activities, but this is really lack the control needed to be truly autonomous. Speaking of robotic control and sensitivity… is this all the room for error a roboticist needs? Many roboticists (and engineers in general) are skeptical about robot ethics. Partly it's the same skeptical process that goes into engineering machines for the car and surrounding it with regulation. I also agree that in many cases rationality is less important than being moral, but still it's good to be careful. Consider that what robot ethics talk about is the relatively trivial sense of abhorrence of hurting people as opposed to a matter of morality. I can't imagine any robot designer not wanting to avoid hurting people. My skepticism comes from many case studies where designers didn't think about or even know that their robot could be the cause of a great deal of harm to people. It's usually self-limiting to a point for any designer ("if my robot does this then we know at least we designed it in good faith"). That's the easy part. A second sort of confusion comes up in most discussions of robots, is that of standing for something. It's a natural tendency for people to want to make people or machines stand for things, in a sort of analogy way. Machines are supposed to accomplish their functions without crying or having their feelings hurt. Yet it seems self-evident that having feelings is central to being a person. Take ethics as an example. It's one of the areas where machines (the universal heuristics and the extensions) are supposed to be ethical agents. This raises two questions in my mind. Does a machine have ethics if it (and we) lack the moral concepts
