The saga that is Star Wars: The Last Jedi is drawing to a close. Or is it? For much of the first weekend in December, the film remained hotly debated, and not just because the audience numbers are in. While one might think that a majority of people who went to see the movie would have enjoyed it, the debate started in the comments section of a certain review. On Rotten Tomatoes, The Last Jedi has a very modest rating of 50 percent, with 14 positive and 5 negative reviews. But there's a bit more nuance to this than it might seem. What we should be more worried about is the inclusion of one particularly negative review, one that has garnered 1.4 million views (and counting). It happened during the first weekend of December, when dozens of women took to Twitter with the hashtag #FleabagStarWars, to publicly denounce the film for objectifying women and mocking female sexuality. Even though the movie is no longer a very new thing, the abuse that women are (and have been) receiving at the hands of the franchise has continued. However, a lot of these women have seen the film and have apparently found a lot to object to. Some are also upset about the perceived lack of diversity in this "women's movie," but we'll get to that in a second. Notably, the theater where The Last Jedi opened was the same one where the aforementioned review went up. It was in that theater and the negative review was written, and the woman who wrote it now isn't happy. It got her attention, and she was moved to post a response, which was then retweeted over 100,000 times and still spreading. "I'm saddened," she wrote, "when I walk into the theater and see the same stupid comments we see every day about the 'man shortage,' 'short skirts,' and 'rapey men.' If we're going to have a bunch of entitled guys whining about that, then where is the damn movie?" She wasn't done there either. "If this is true, then why do these
