Is it legal to write software code that programs a computer or device using a method where you program it to run your own algorithms on a powerful machine with a lot of memory - then use the results to program a less powerful but cheaper computer or device. If so, what legal implications does this have? The idea behind the idea is to allow small business and start-ups to make their own modifications and customisations to existing technologies, then sell them on. A: Disclaimer: IANAL. I would think that it's most likely legal under US copyright law, which allows authors to sell their work as long as you don't make a practice of it. In practice, this may mean that you can't make a profit from your software, and that your users have to buy it from you. However, you will have no problems if your users can directly use your software. In this case, since the code is your own, it's not really a copy of any copyright-protected work, so the user can pretty much do what they want with it.
